Date of release: May 2nd 2008 worldwide, digital

Exactly 2 years after their energetic US debut album "Ecclesiophobia", TAXIM now has the energy system running on reserve power; at least thematically.

On their new 6 track EP "Psychologenfutter", and how could it be different, System Cs is getting back unwanted content from System Ucs - a picture of Sigmund Freud's couch that was used during his sessions would have been a great front cover for this release as well.

Via "cut up samples" (partially spoken by the new singer M.R.) mastermind Alex is spreading his concealed embassies, whilst impulsive beats actually forbid thinking. So there's no sign of rest, because TAXIM present themselves quite unlike they used to: in a thick and modern sound.

As for the music, TAXIM mostly offer well-engineered techno-industrial at various harshness. The song material of the trance-ish original version has been remixed three times over. It goes from some of the calm flair of the 1980s to hard beats for the dance-floor, each respectively for your neck fracture at home.

Additionally to this set of versions, there's one of those TAXIM typical high-speed attacks: in this case a little hardcore influenced ("Positiv Negativ"). There is also a funny-farm ringing remix of the title track, by the also German dark electro-duo e:nity.
